About the Author

Christopher Tyler is an English visual neuroscientist based in San Francisco with extensive interests in the historical development of ideas. His scientific work is focused on the understanding of the human perception of the third dimension, but has ranged from the dynamics of color vision to the diagnosis of medical disorders of the visual system. He stumbled onto the issue of the parallel history of the Alice stories through an investigation of the role of women in the European intellectual lineage, such as the founding of universities. His publications include books (Computer Vision: From Surfaces to 3D Objects and Human Symmetry Perception and Its Computational Analysis) and over 100 articles on visual neuroscience, art and history. Tyler is also a well-known lecturer internationally, who has presented his interdisciplinary work at the World Science Fair, the Frist Art Museum, Cambridge University, and BBC Oxford. Among his achievements is the 1979 invention of the first “random-dot autostereogram,” popularly known as the “Magic Eye” after a publication using this invention spent a number of weeks on the New York Times Bestsellers list.
